monthly book giveaway

Sharing my favourite reads

It doesn't have to be a Christmas book to appeal to Christmas lovers. My own love of Christmas and family shines through in my very first book, Tangled Threads. With no family of her own, Kate's found family embrace her at four different Christmases in this parallel lives romance.

What if her future lies in a time-tangled past?

Hoping to escape the losses that have plagued her life so far, Kate Moreton heads for the bright lights of London in search of the perfect man and the perfect family life she craves. But her journey takes her in directions she never expected. Within time's tangled threads lies the promise of two men, two loves, and two lives—but also the risk of losing them both forever.

Last month, Lyn was the winner of a copy of The Mistletoe Motive by Chloe Liese, a fantastic Christmas novella.

Now's the perfect time for a little Christmas gift-to-self and what better gift for a book-lover than a book. I had the privilege to read this one as it came into being last November, watched it grow into the just-released second edition, and wait with bated breath as it becomes a fully-grown audiobook.

The Trouble With Christmas by Loren Sorensen is also a best friend's brother story involving a troublesome Christmas tree that is determined to make a match between Rayanne and her bestie's younger brother Caleb. I love this book and I think you might too. It's available pretty much everywhere! Cover also by Ollie!

Books, films and music

Reading: Just when I think my reading year couldn't get any better, along come more fabulous books. Tarah de Witt goes straight to my favourite author list with these two. Savor It was so good, as disgraced chef meets a small town teacher. But The Co-op tugged at my heart even more—second chance, my favourite trope—and I was so sad to finish this fantastic love-to-hate-to-love story. Another new to me author, Kate Robb, didn't disappoint. Once again I've found a kindred spirit, an author who loves writing about parallel lives. I read Prime Time

Romance as a buddy read, and straight away knew I had to read This Spells Love. I devoured these two and highly recommend her books. It wouldn't be a Caroline reading month without some sports romance! Collide was an excellent college hockey romance that fans of Elle Kennedy will love. After spending a large part of my life married to a Formula 1 fan, Cross The Line felt authentically set within a parallel F1 world. I really enjoyed the couple, as a bit like Christian and Haley, he's best friends with her brother, which is such a good trope.

Watching: I was excited to see the return of some favourites. We ate up the second series of The Diplomat. Meanwhile new episodes of Yellowstone and Outlander are dropping weekly.

Listening: With the daily need to find music for reels and posts for The Twelve Days of Christian, and because I've been super busy, and because why not at this time of year, I've been listening to lots of Christmas music. Who'd have guessed so many artists have put out Christmas songs?

author update

Caroline's writing life

I've always been a disciplined writer, which has certainly paid off this last month. There have been times I've wondered about the wisdom of launching a new book in what is the busiest time of year at my day job, but I did it. And I'm proud to say I still persevered with writing every day, so Blindsided By You continues to grow. I have a hilarious friend (yes, you know it's you I'm talking about) who keeps sharing video of gorgeous rugby players on Instagram with me 'for the purposes of research'. That's my excuse for watching them over and over and I'm sticking to it. When I drag myself back to my computer, I'm about two-thirds through Jenna and Geordie's story, right at the part where people in the small town start to find out about their secret relationship. Fortunately for both of them, Jenna's father, the rugby team coach, hasn't found out—yet. In the new year, I'll start to share snippets with you.

The positive reviews keep coming for The Twelve Days of Christian and while writing it was hard work, and promoting it is very time consuming, it's all worth it when readers let you know how much they love a book.

caroline's corner

Welcome to my world

Christmas preparation is not going well here! It started with Mr C's brave admission that he 'thinks' he 'accidentally' *rolling my eyes in disbelief* threw out my Christmas tree stand! Then I find that my regular source of a beautiful tree, the local volunteer fire brigade, isn't selling trees this year. The final straw was when I realised even if I go all out to get a tree this weekend, I'll only have a few days to appreciate it. Next week we are off to housesit a beautiful dog, an aptly Christmas-named Samoyed called Blitzen. We are only back one day and then we make the five-hour drive to stay with family for Christmas followed by a New Year vacation with friends. So, I've accepted there will be no tree for me this year, my decorations languishing in their boxes for another twelve months. I'll need to live on the memories of last year's trees like these pictured, a selection of all the ones I insisted on photos with on our USA holiday.

I'm writing this surrounded by Christmas presents waiting to be wrapped. It's a task I dread as I'm absolutely useless at it! This week I destroyed two pieces of Christmas paper while trying to wrap a simple box. Yesterday I bought a heap of little gift bags for some oddly shaped items rather than risk my feeble attempts. For the rest, I'll soldier on and hope the people receiving them are so happy with the gift they overlook the shoddy wrapping.

Despite all these little challenges, I still love this time of year. The nostalgia of Christmas past combined with the joy of spending time with family and friends in the present is a special magic. I hope your Christmas is magical too.

Talk to you again in 2025
